

The internet as it exists today has played a large role in enhancing communication. My future's success depends largely on the internet. The ability to communicate to clients at home, converse to family and friends overseas, and the possibility of a remote trial in the future are all roles the internet will aid in my career and life as a lawyer.

Communicating to a client from my home via the internet and skype will be an amenity I will have when I become a civil lawyer. With the technology of the internet I would be able to easily send information to a client and talk face to face without the travel expenses. I would also be able to have clients from all over the United States.

I intend to spend a year in Spain during college. This will be a long time away from my family and friends. Before the internet, a letter overseas could take weeks to reach its destination. But now, I will be able to see my family while in Europe. Along with traveling with my family later in life I will still be able to be reachable for clients via the internet.

With the rapid advances of the internet, someday it will be possible to have an entire trial remotely from different locations. Changes in venue will no longer be necessary for high profile cases. This technology would enable me to have multiple cases at once, and to potentially be in court multiple times in one day.

Future developments of the internet are limited only by one's creativity. Given our dependence developed over such a short time span, it's exciting to think of the possibilities of the future.

-Kathryn R. Moore